All images were created by David Baxley (and the TrekMaster for your tour). The photographs were printed using a chemical process on the highest quality paper (Fuji Chrystal Archive) to provide the longest lasting and most faithful color reproduction available. These are NOT short-lived inkjet prints.

Panoramic Prints: All of the panoramic prints have been created by joining multiple individual digital camera pictures into one larger composite image using specialized computer software. This composite image is completely seamless, and there is no indication of where the images have been merged. Why go through the exercise of stitching multiple images, when one would suffice? One reason is to create a panoramic image -- one that covers a wider field of view than would be possible with a conventional camera lens. Just as important -- perhaps even more important for me -- is the ability to create big images. Combining 5 or 10 images from a 15 megapixel high-quality digital SLR camera produces a picture with the equivalent of 50 to 120 million pixels -- capturing far more detail than is captured by any of today's consumer-level digital cameras, exceeding 35mm and medium format film cameras, and rivaling large format film cameras. Because of this detail, these stitched images produce extremely sharp, detailed prints at sizes of up to 20x30 inches and well beyond. In contrast, prints of this size from single digital camera images typically lack detail and appear soft.
